The topographical character of the surroundings ($\sim 10\%$)¹⁰ is a key factor in the design of the campus, as a "natural rectangle" between two different conditions.¹¹ This notion of the essential character of the surroundings was the point of departure for all the designs that OJA produced for this site. Two significant decisions contributed to this notion. To the north, the area had been levelled and its level raised in 1874,¹² while the terrain of traffic split by a highway running in both directions, the road became more of a physical barrier than ever before, not only between the two parks but also between Museum Park and the nineteenth-century street blocks on Esplanade and in the adjacent Backlands district. To the west, the medical faculty designed by OJA had introduced an entirely new sense of scale to the corner of the Esplanade area, along with a new, self-contained type of building (see Fig. 2.1). It has more affinity with a 1900s megastore than with the traditional European city. The first 15 meters above the ground – critical for any attraction in the tradition of Giza and Baroque – are nothing but an endowment and constantly transforming feeling, from which the lower areas as the only distinct shape, its facade of white unornamented aluminum concrete panels, designed by Jussi Pyykkö, display the virtues of technological innovation and industrial prefabrication, underscoring the other character of the complex with regard to its built environment. In the park and along the river the presence of the tower is inescapable, given its extent and its height of 114 meters.
