

Cosmic rays composition

- Cosmic rays are high-energy particles originating from outer space
- They primarily consist of protons, with a smaller amount of heavier nuclei and a tiny fraction of electrons and positrons
- These rays are believed to be produced by supernovae, active galactic nuclei, and other cosmic phenomena
- Understanding their composition helps scientists study high-energy processes in the universe

Practical example: Aerospace

- Cosmic rays, high-energy particles from space, impact aerospace technology and travel
- When these particles encounter the Earth's atmosphere, they can affect spacecraft, satellites, and aviation electronics
- In aerospace environments, cosmic rays contribute to background radiation levels, posing risks to both on-board systems and crew health
- Engineers must design spacecraft and aircraft to mitigate these effects, using materials and technologies that shield sensitive components
