Summary

The May 2015 release of the report of the President's Task Force on 21st Century Policing highlighted a fundamental change in the issues dominating discussions about policing in America. That change has moved discussions away from a focus on what is legal or effective in crime control and toward a concern for how the actions of the police influence public trust and confidence in the police. This shift in discourse has been motivated by two factors—first, the recognition by public officials that increases in the professionalism of the police and dramatic declines in the rate of crime have not led to increases in police legitimacy, and second, greater awareness of the limits of the dominant coercive model of policing and of the benefits of an alternative and more consensual model based on public trust and confidence in the police and legal system. Psychological research has played an important role in legitimating this change in the way policymakers think about policing by demonstrating that perceived legitimacy shapes a set of law-related behaviors as well as or better than concerns about the risk of punishment. Those behaviors include compliance with the law and cooperation with legal authorities. These findings demonstrate that legal authorities gain by a focus on legitimacy. Psychological research has further contributed by articulating and demonstrating empirical support for a central role of procedural justice in shaping legitimacy, providing legal authorities with a clear road map of strategies for creating and maintaining public trust. Given evidence of the benefits of legitimacy and a set of guidelines concerning its antecedents, policymakers have increasingly focused on the question of public trust when considering issues in policing. The acceptance of a legitimacy-based consensual model of police authority building on theories and research studies originating within psychology illustrates how psychology can contribute to the development of evidence-based policies in the field of criminal law.

Introduction

The development of police research provides an example of how initially academic psychological theories and experimental laboratory-based research conducted by social psychologists can provide a powerful alternative to some of the traditional models that have dominated law and public policy. For this to happen, it is necessary for those models to speak to issues that are important to the actors in the legal system. In this case, leaders of the national policing community have adopted models drawn from psychological research on legitimacy because both the limits of traditional deterrence models and the strengths of a legitimacy-based model have become clear.

This change also offers a striking example of how society can benefit from the importation of psychological models into public policy. After decades of seeking to motivate compliance primarily through the use of sanctions, legal authorities have recognized two consequences. The first is that they have not successfully addressed the issue of public trust in the police, the courts, and the law.
