

Summary

Charlie and the Great Glass Elevator is a work of fiction, aimed at an audience of children, written by Roald Dahl and published in 1972. It is the sequel to his 1964 work Charlie and the Chocolate Factory. Beginning on the heels of the first novel's action, it follows protagonist Charlie Bucket, his parents, and both sets of his grandparents as they shoot up into space in Wonka's magical glass elevator. The group saves an American spaceship and escapes the clutches of Vermicious Knids, then returns to Wonka's chocolate factory. Like Charlie and the Chocolate Factory, the novel prioritizes Imagination and Adventure and suggests that Greed and Gluttony Will Be Punished. The novel also, through a hyperbolically incompetent president and group of presidential advisors, represents Politicians as Ineffectual and Ridiculous.

This guide uses the 1972 hardback edition of Charlie and the Great Glass Elevator, published by Puffin Books.

Plot Summary

The events of Charlie and the Great Glass Elevator immediately follow the events of Charlie and the Chocolate Factory; the Buckets (Grandpa George, Grandma Georgina, Grandma Josephine, Mr. Bucket, and Mrs. Bucket) have just been collected by Wonka, Grandpa Joe, and Charlie in Wonka's glass elevator, which has burst through the roof of Wonka's factory.

The elevator continues to shoot up through the sky; soon, they are so high that the continents become visible. The Buckets begin to panic. Wonka explains that they need to travel to a high height to gather enough speed to crash back through the factory roof. Right as he is about to press the elevator's down button, Grandma Georgina angrily grabs him, preventing him from pressing the button in time, and the elevator leaves the Earth's atmosphere. The group, as well as the grandparents' bed, becomes weightless. They are spotted by a group of American astronauts, who are flying a Commuter Capsule of hotel staff to the new, state-of-the-art Space Hotel "U.S.A."

Wonka and the Buckets see Space Hotel "U.S.A." and decide to visit it. However, the astronauts interpret their visit as a terrorist invasion of an American asset, and the action is televised to the American President, who worries that the grandparents' bed is a bomb.
