(TCO 6) a) Explain the tools used to pursue expansionary and contractionary fiscal policy. During which phases of the business cycle would each be appropriate b) Explain what is meant by a built-in stabilizer and give two examples.

ANSWERED..

TCO8) Types of trade barriers: Specific tariffs Ad valorem tariffs Licenses Import quotas Tariff exemptions Tariff quotas Most-favored-nation
Trade barriers Despite all the obvious benefits of international trade, governments have a tendency to put up trade barriers to protect the domestic industry. There are two kinds of barriers: tariff and non-tariff. Tariff barriers Tariff is a tax levied on goods traded internationally. When imposed on goods being brought into the country, it is referred to as an import duty. Import duty is levied to increase the effective cost of imported goods to increase the demand for domestically produced goods. Another type of tariff, less frequently imposed, is the export duty, which is levied on goods being taken out of the country, to discourage their export. This may be done if the country is facing a shortage of that particular commodity, or if the government wants to promote the export of that good in some other form. For example, a processed form rather than a raw material form. It may also be done to discourage exporting of natural resources. When imposed on goods passing through the country, the tariff is called transit duty. Tariff can be imposed on three different bases. A specific duty is a flat duty based on the number of units regardless of the value of the goods. For example, there may be a duty of $10,000 per computer imported into India.
