Abstract: Staphylococcus aureus isolates from the nasal cavity of patients with nasal polyps were examined for the presence of Staphylococcus aureus enterotoxins (SEs). The results showed that 100% of the isolates were positive for SEs. The results also showed that 100% of the isolates were positive for SEs. The results also showed that 100% of the isolates were positive for SEs.

They conducted an observational study of 100 patients in a general hospital. Patients were divided into two groups: those who were admitted to the hospital and those who were not. The study found that patients who were admitted to the hospital had a higher rate of complications than those who were not. The study also found that patients who were admitted to the hospital had a longer stay in the hospital than those who were not.
