Abstract

Researchers across the disciplines use different designs in the quest to authentically reflect the phenomena they investigate. One design claiming to capture the lived experiences of individuals in an appropriate way is qualitative-case study. This article focuses on generalisability of qualitative case study research findings by reflecting on educational policy research conducted in Ghana to explore the lived experiences of students, teachers and school managers in Ghanaian high schools, with an eye to the potential of positive behaviour management in that specific West African context. The claim made here is that generalisation from individual case studies is both possible and worth doing in so far as the theoretical underpinning is well grounded. This research seeks to justify the use of qualitative-case-study research in educational policy research. The distinctiveness of this methodological approach lies in its ability to generalise the findings.

Keywords: Qualitative, case study, generalisation, theory, Ghana

1.0 Introduction

The qualitative case study which is the subject of reflection in this article was theory-oriented but very much rooted in the reality of contemporary Ghanaian High Schools. It was a product of on-the-ground doctoral research carried out by Ghanaian researcher working in Education at an English university. The research was conducted using interviews, documentary analysis and direct observation. Even though this case study was qualitative in approach, case study research can also be used for both quantitative and qualitative approaches (Chen & Oliver, 2018; Yin, 2018; Gerring, 2017; Hancock & Algozzine, 2017; Hanna, 2000); there is sometimes an erroneous impression that quantitative data cannot be collected and analysed using case study design (Chen & Oliver, 2018; see Yin, 2018; Gerring, 2017; Hancock & Algozzine, 2017).

The phenomenon of interest in this case study research was Positive Behaviour Management in Ghanaian Schools (PBM). Ibrahim (2017) uses the concept of PBM to refer to "forms of behaviour management in school that seek to ensure that the rights, dignity and self-esteem of students are safeguarded" (p. 17). The key findings of this research indicate that emotional and physical abuses (e.g. caning, public humiliation, hostile eye contact, among others) are generally common, and are being encouraged by school teachers' perception and policy prescription that school punishment should be painful and deterrent.

Using Foucault's (1977) theoretical work on discipline and punishment, the findings show the nature of teacher disciplinary measures to be abusive and reprehensible on the grounds of being essentially anti-educational in spirit. On this basis, a recommendation was made for re-engineering of policy on behaviour management in Ghanaian Schools. To take such a culturally fundamental policy change seriously, policy-makers, policy-entrepreneurs, policy-engineers and classroom practitioners would require evidence that can be trusted. This paper argues that qualitative case study research can be taken seriously, providing what the authors like to term 'authentic' evidence by a methodological approach with rigorous, in-depth evidence-gathering mechanisms (see Chen & Oliver, 2018; Yin, 2018; Gerring, 2017; Hancock & Algozzine, 2017).
