

CHAPTER 2

Perception

CHAPTER OBJECTIVES

When students finish this chapter they should:

- Understand the difference between sensation and perception.
- Understand that perception is a three-stage process that translates raw stimuli into meaning.
- Understand that marketers can appeal to each of the sensory systems in a variety of ways.
- Understand how the concept of a sensory threshold is important for marketing communication.
- Understand that subliminal advertising is a controversial—but largely ineffective—way to persuade consumers.
- Understand that a variety of factors can influence what stimuli consumers will pay attention to.
- Understand that we interpret the stimuli to which we do pay attention according to learned patterns and expectations.

CHAPTER SUMMARY

- Perception is the process by which physical sensations such as sights, sounds, and smells are selected, organized, and interpreted. The eventual interpretation of a stimulus allows it to be assigned meaning.
- Marketing stimuli have important sensory qualities. We rely on colours, odours, sounds, tastes, and the “feel” of products when evaluating them. Not all sensations make their way successfully through the perceptual process though. Many stimuli compete for our attention and the majority are not noticed or accurately comprehended. People have different thresholds of perception. A stimulus must be presented at a certain level of intensity before it can be detected by an individual’s sensory receptors. In addition, a consumer’s ability to detect whether two stimuli are different (the differential threshold) is an important issue in many marketing contexts, such as changing a package design, altering the size of a product, or reducing its price.
