

Silence

We watch, he and I. We watch as with each passing of the Sun, the Earth greys away; overgrown by the concrete towers that inhabit below. Swarms of people march blankly along the in-betweens of the buildings - their heavy footsteps clattering against the beaten path. Busses, taxis, cars all share the same narrow road and quick temper - curses being thrown out of car windows and the blasting of horns completing the busyness of city life.

Noise.

They're numbed to the never-ending buzz of the city. Numbed to the point that noise has become a necessity; the two are inseparable.

I no longer have a place in their life.

I am no longer heard.

I have been drowned under the white noise polluting the Earth.

Ever since they manufactured their second sun, lights warm, then cool. It never fades in their cities, only replacing each other as one starts to lose its colour. Night, day become one and the same; white lucent rays consuming every part of every being - always.

Brother, you too are no longer.

I understand. In this world, striving for instantaneous, we serve as a problem; a barricade disrupting the evermore rushing current. It is an unspeakable truth: we have become weakness, so undesirable that they flee at the sight of us. But this is the illusion they have been fooled into believing: that distance from us is productivity, that we are the problem. This is a problem.

Though even if they did desire us, they would never experience our purest selves, not in the state of their Earth. Regardless, we stay and we watch and we wait. We hold to the hope that one day, these people will slow. Maybe even...

stop.
