Corporate Real Estate Asset Management in the United States Peter Read Veale, 1988 This research is an assessment of the management of buildings and land for large organizations both public and private that are not primarily in the real estate business An investigation of the current management practices priorities planning horizons motivations and attitudes of managers for these assets was conducted by way of an indepth survey of senior real estate executives at 284 large U S corporations and institutions The research shows that despite their tremendous value corporate real estate assets are often under managed The market value of a corporation's buildings and land typically represents 25 percent of total assets but ranges from 10 to 50 percent and in some cases is reported higher Among those surveyed less than half consistently evaluate their real estate assets independently either as a cost center or profit center One in five does not evaluate their real estate at all One of the most significant conclusions of the research is that large numbers of corporate real estate managers do not maintain adequate information on their real estate assets One in four does not maintain a real estate inventory Two out of three do not maintain a real estate management information system MIS One in four is uncertain of the market value of the organization's real estate and one in three is uncertain of the acquisition cost Based on similar research conducted in 1981 by Harvard Real Estate Inc the 1987 research suggests that little has changed over the six year span Statistical Hypothesis testing of the data using Chi Square methods reveals that 1 Profit centers do not indicate more effective management of buildings and land than cost centers but that those who do not separately evaluate their real estate as either a cost or profit center are less effective than those who do 2 Effective management of corporate real estate is unrelated to the size of the real estate portfolio but directly related to management attitude and 3 the use of computers in corporate real estate does not necessarily indicate effective management The research concludes with discussions of the role of information and general management in corporate real estate and examines the future of the field both as an emerging branch of management and an emerging academic discipline
