

HOW DO YOU DOCK AN INBOARD?

If the boat has a right-hand propeller — like all Cantares do — approach the dock with the port (left) side of the boat. With the motor at idle — and the boat 1'-2' away from the dock — swing engine into reverse and the boat will swing into position for tying up.

B. In A Current

Move in against the current even, though you are going to dock head on the starboard side. It takes very little power to steer against the torque (twisting motion of the propeller).

C. Beating A Wind

Depending on the severity of the wind, dock as (A) if wind is moderate, and (B) if the wind is strong.

In all cases, you can dock either way depending on your preference. When you acquire that proficiency you will have the personal satisfaction of being an adept boat handler.

HOW DO YOU DRIVE INBOARD INTO SLIP?

As long as you have forward motion under power, you'll have steering control. However, you must have the boat in such an attitude so that when you apply reverse the boat will go with the torque and stop in the desired position.

In any event, when in close quarters in a slip or dockside, proceed with caution so if you can see you will bump the dock — you can have time to "catch" the pilings or head off from another tied-up boat.

You may find it easier to back into a slip in a relatively more maneuvered with stern thruster, it makes you look like a true pro.

Drive boat toward the slip or shore. When bow of boat nears the slip, turn ab beam slip so stern will swing toward the T.

Then reverse engine or engines or boat into slip using forward and reverse the progress. It is a wise idea to set the bit over tiller and keep it there until it is secure.

Most people prefer to drive bow in, always remember to leave the T cutting slightly across to the left or right. Then apply a little power in reverse with them swing or straighten out to the proper corner of the slip location.
