

vadas, la elección pública contiene una indivisibilidad esencial con un único resultado sobre cualquier hecho concreto.

¿Cómo funciona el mecanismo de la elección pública en la práctica?

En general, las sociedades democráticas confían en la regla de la mayoría para tomar decisiones. Bajo este sistema, una ley se aprueba cuando más de la mitad de los votantes lo hacen.

Aunque las virtudes de la regla de la mayoría son evidentes, ésta puede conducir a una situación de «tiranía» por parte de la mayoría. La mayoría puede imponer su voluntad política sobre las minorías. Para tratar de evitar estos peligros se suele exigir una mayoría calificada para la aprobación de determinados asuntos de especial interés. Esto ocurre no sólo a nivel político, con la aprobación de determinadas leyes, sino también en el mundo empresarial. Así, en ciertos casos, para decisiones trascendentes de las empresas, los directorios se rigen por mayorías calificadas superiores al 51 por 100.

La paradoja del voto

El problema más importante que afronta una sociedad a través del proceso político es cómo conciliar las diferentes opiniones e intereses de sus miembros.

Una de las dificultades que plantea la toma de decisiones a través del sistema político es el conocido como la paradoja del voto (véase Nota complementaria 4.6). Este problema consiste en que un grupo de personas y la sociedad en general puede que no sean capaces de ordenar distintas posibilidades por medio de la votación por mayoría. El hecho de que tres o más personas no sean capaces de utilizar la votación por mayoría para tomar decisiones coherentes se concreta en que las decisiones que se toman por votación pueden depender de aspectos que parecen meros detalles de procedimiento, tales como el orden en que ésta se realiza.

Que la capacidad para establecer el orden de intervención sea a menudo determinante para el resultado de la votación, es de hecho una inconsistencia y prueba de las limitaciones del sistema de votación por mayoría como mecanismo de elección.
