Abstract: In 1999, the U.S. Department of Justice announced that it had reached a non-prosecution agreement with the U.S. Postal Service regarding the agency's handling of the 1996 election results. The agreement was based on the finding that the Postal Service had not acted with intent to defraud or to obstruct justice. This paper examines the factors that led to the non-prosecution agreement and the implications for the future of the Postal Service.
