Summary

- Announced in April 2022, the Global Security Initiative (GSI) embodies Xi Jinping's vision for a new international order in which China plays a larger security role. The initiative is not only a rhetorical campaign to win international support but also an organizing framework within which Chinese security actors can deepen concrete security cooperation with other countries.
- China has prioritized its security relations in Southeast and Central Asia, and this is where the GSI has begun to manifest operational features, such as the development of military and security activities.

- Experts and policymakers from those regions highlight the perceived advantages of embracing the GSI. These include closer economic ties with China and direct and indirect assistance from China in confronting an array of traditional and nontraditional security threats.

- However, states in both regions are also wary of growing security dependency on China, which has itself been fomenting regional instabilities—particularly given the uncertainty of the GSI's goals and future course.
- The United States needs to acquire a clear understanding of the GSI's goals and impacts and to recalibrate US policy in Southeast and Central Asia accordingly.
