We discuss challenges in China's 13th Five Year Plan on National Economic and Social Development, and examine possibly relevant frameworks from management, law, and social sciences. We specifically emphasize: applying research about private public partnerships and intergroup collaboration to facilitate cooperative economic development in regions involving sovereignty disputes such as the South China Sea; and supplementing government innovation policies based on the Triple Helix model with approaches that better reflect evolving nature of the nature of innovation and its behavioral processes. Keywords: China's 13th Five Year Plan, Public-Private Partnerships, National Innovation Systems, Triple Helix, Creative Economy, Smart Cities.

Introduction

China's 13th Five-Year Plan aims to transform China's economy from an investment-driven approach to a focus on improving the quality of life of China's nearly 1.4 billion people. Simply stated, China's growth is translated into benefits for the masses rather than fortunes for a few. The main focus of China's 13th Five Year Plan concerning development is to focus on the increasingly fierce international competition and the development of China's economic power, which includes the development institutional frameworks to promote innovation and first-mover advantage (NPC 2015).

China's Five-Year Plans are social and economic development blueprints that were adopted in China in 1953 and modified after the Soviet central planning process. The plans are drafted and implemented by central, provincial, local, and district governments, along with industry regulators—each often has their own FYP (Huauck 2015). The central FYP is drafted by the National Development and Reform Commission (NDRC) and lays out specific economic targets like GDP growth rates and social development goals in areas such as healthcare and education. Targets are established in consultation with experts from academia, industry, and other government ministries. The targets guide Chinese regulators throughout the five-year implementation period of the plan (Huauck 2015).

A five-year plan thus signals the Chinese government's vision for future reforms and communicates this to other parts of the bureaucracy, industry players and Chinese citizens, for example its "New Silk Road" vision to expand trade to more than 40 countries to $2.5 trillion within a decade (Economist, September 2015). However the specific plans and mechanisms for how such visions are to be accomplished, for example what combination of increasing global sales by China's entrepreneurial companies and/or facilitations of state and private outward investments. While we note this lack of detail, the 13th Five Year Plan is still an invaluable top-level reference for multinationalists as they seek to align with China's policy direction, understand government motivations and develop business strategies.

To better understand where applied social sciences knowledge may be relevant to the success of the 13th Five Year Plan, this paper analyzes some key parts of the plan and the issues they bring up as highlighted in Table 1.

1. Understand the history, logic, and goals and implications of China's Five Year Plan.
2. Identify the social and economic frameworks presently in place for the implementation of China's Five Year Plan, and apparent issues.
3. Using insights from recent studies of national competitiveness initiatives, emerging innovation approaches, sustainable city initiatives, governance of megaprojects, and public-private partnerships to identify
